

How COVID-19 may impact those living with domestic violence

Forced Isolation

- Forced Isolation may be harder to recognize during physical distancing. An abusive partner may limit social interaction with colleagues, friends, and family during working from home arrangements.

Reduced Accommodation Options

- Reduced Accommodation Options make it even harder to leave an abusive partner. Physical distancing makes it harder to stay with friends, and many landlords have temporarily stopped taking new applicants.

Increase use of Abuse Tactics

- This may show up in signs not apparent before - like bruises or burns, or in sharing about instances of sexual or emotional abuse.

Unable to Communicate

- It may be more difficult for someone in an abusive relationship to communicate during social isolation because their partner may be more closely monitoring or limiting their technology use.

Increase in incidence of Child Abuse

- With children now at home more there may be more incidences of child abuse happening in the home. Be mindful of communication that indicates signs of child abuse are present. If you suspect a child is at risk, you are legally required to report it. 1-800-387-5437 (KIDS)

Withholding items and medical care

- Abusive partners may withhold necessary items, such as hand sanitizer or disinfectants.
- Abusive partners may prevent survivors from seeking medical attention if they need it or find ways to control access to extended health benefits.

Travel restrictions

- Travel restrictions and fewer travel options may impact a survivor's escape or safety plan - it may not be safe for them to use public transportation or access flights or buses.

Limited Financial Assistance

- An abusive partner may block their partner from applying for employment insurance benefits or other forms of COVID-19 financial assistance, making them more dependent on the abuser.
